

Kickstarter intentionally allowed the creator to stay anonymous and now shield him from legal consequences when the creators fraud has become plain obvious !

The Zoommaker campaign is in that way unique that Kickstarter themselves could be made responsible for all the backers loss of nearly $100k.

And first step would be to set Kickstarter a deadline to provide us with their contact details of the creator, so we can take legal actions against the creator. It then might very well turn out that Kickstarter themselves have been deceived with a false identity for which they could be held responsible..

This might be a rare case where suing Kickstarter could succeed.

Hi Simon

We have submitted our company information to Kickstarter by the requirements of the platform. We do not want to publish our company information to avoid malicious targeting by our competitors.

Then Robo Durden reported this campaign with "Take a look at the comment section where we honest backers try to prevent fellow backers from losing..."

and Kickstarter responed with "We've investigated and determined that it doesn't violate our rules or community guidelines. ..."

It will be no surprise when the person Yixin CHEN (that Kickstarter had the responsibility to verify) does not exist. Then Kickstarter would have been cheated but have taken the responsibility to provide us with the cheaters name..
